A Pinner Costume in Green and Gold-Gowns Subjects of Exhaustless Studies-House Dress to Wear.

[Oerrespondence of the Richmond Dispatch.] New York, November 29, 1890. Nowadays it seems as though the evening-gown were rather out of it. Certainly one must have fitting evening attire and frequently the dancing costume is elegant, rich, costly, and all that, but It is on the demi-toilet that fair woman really expends her taste and the modinner-dress, or reception-gown simply folk, champion of the State, carried off wwo of the prizes; Mr. R. A POETIC STUDY. It is a dinner costume and it is a most poetic study in green and gold. To begin at the beginning-or thereabout. There is a jacket with a rolling collar that stands straight up in the back, coming forward, follows the eccentric lines of the zouave front, and presente a facing or lining—whichever you will—of silk in a sort of golden-fawa ahade. The jacket, I should explain, is of dark-green velvet, covered at the Underneath is a waistcoat of the golden It is understood that she will sail next cipline which cravat. The waistcoat divides at the waist but its sides are continued down upon the hips.

THE SKIRT. The skirt is in a rich, pleasing shade parents, Captain and Mrs. Tiernon, of tween the Liberal and Conservative parof green—the fabric peau de soie, and is slightly draped, looping beneath the waistcoat to the left hip and so displaying a very little of the brocade petticoat which in its colorings represents all the holes are coloring to the first party while working directly with Mr. Gladstone. hues seen in the gown. It is indoors that we are expending all our thoughts on dress. It is getting too cold to show more than our wraps outside, you know, so home costumes have become of immense importance to the very smallest detail, even to one's Tea-gowns are subjects of exhaustless MOVEMENTS OF NAVAL AND MILITARY MEN.

The materials are cash-mere and crepe de chine and velvet, and they are brought together thus: The body of the gown (which is upon the princesse plan) is of very pale, faint, gray cashmere, and is made with a short, round train. On the front thick folds of crepe do chine, coming from within the collar enclose a plastron of deep slate-gray velvet, and are then drawn down to the waist where they meet in a point. The full sleeves are of the velvet, and there is a band or edging of the same around the foot of the skirt. On the back the seams are, oddly enough, marked with braiding in black silk.

The gown is unusually graceful—an effect of the train, which is not often enough applied to our house dresses.

(New York Times.) It is plain that Mr. Parnell has no intention of giving up the leadership un-less he is forced to do so. That is a question hardly to be determined before the meeting of the party on Monday, if then. While it is clear enough that the retention of Parnell as a leader will wreck the Irish cause for the present, it is by no means clear that his resignation would leave the Irish party united. He has not a word to say regarding the seandal that has brought disgrace upon him and imperils the cause which, he professes, lies close to his heart, stead he recounts his conferences with Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Morley, and undertakes to show that in the event of the success of the Liberals in the coming elections the Irish people might not receive in every single respect the consideration to which they think them-selves entitled. He pleads for an Irish party independent of English parties, and says that the postponement of home rule is preferable to any surrender of
